

CONTENTS HCPJ APRIL 2005

1 Editorial

2 News

3 Reflections... on the NICE guidance

Who sexed up the NICE guideline on anxiety? asks Jeremy Clarke, in a series of email exchanges with BACP lead healthcare advisor John Eatock

4 Dealing with depression

Collaborative working in general practice can substantially aid the recognition of depression, according to April Russello and Michael Harris. Mental health training may be an important factor too

10 Why NICE is good for counsellors

The overall thrust of the guideline is to reorientate treatment in a more psychological direction. This is good news for counsellors, says Ian Hughes

12 Pharma-treatment for depression: an update

The NICE guidance may have simplified GP prescribing for people with depression but difficulties remain in implementing the recommendations in primary care, says Helen Lester

14 Using antidepressants in primary care: keep talking!

Antidepressant prescribing by GPs is far from straightforward, according to Richard Byng. Conversations between primary care-based professionals as well as with patients can help to optimise treatment

16 Counselling for depression: the evidence for

Does counselling have a role in the treatment of depression? Yes it does, says Pete Bower – though the evidence is limited

17 Forthcoming conferences

18 CORE: here's what it's good for

John Mellor-Clark of CORE-IMS describes the benefits of the CORE approach – and why the prospects are so promising for counsellors

22 First aid for mental health

A new training course on helping those in a mental health crisis is now rolling out in Scotland. Its Australian developers Betty Kitchener and Anthony Jorm explain how it works

24 Training counsellors for the NHS: ducklings or swans?

Liz Coldridge considers some of the contentious issues surrounding the training of counsellors for work in healthcare settings

28 Competition or complement?

Are graduate mental health workers really competition for counsellors, asks Peter Jenkins. Or could they play a valuable complementary role?

30 Collaborative care: a firstperson perspective on the graduate worker role

Sarah Hovington offers a unique insight into the graduate worker role

32 Give me the tools...

The Depression, Anxiety and Stress Scale is a really valuable tool, says Mary Roberts

36 On the receiving end

The right medication plus CBT helped Anne Jeffery deal with depression

37 Primary cares

All these depressed people... what do you do? John Hague gives a personal perspective from general practice

38 Book reviews

40 Delivering primary care mental health in Knowsley: a stepped-care approach

Sandra Stock describes a new primary care mental health service staffed by psychological therapists

44 FHCP update

Shane Buckeridge reports on the recent Agenda for Change job seminar workshops